Conclusion

Volunteering in high school predisposes students towards volunteering in college, and is correlated with higher scores in social agency and pluralistic orientation.

Colleges with missions that encompass these values can take advantage of the existing high desirability for volunteering and facilitate such opportunities.

Conclusion

Veterans are coming from different academic backgrounds and have lower academic self concepts.

Veterans have higher social self concepts, and in particular in leadership skills.

Veterans are also less likely to believe they will engage in activities that have been shown to help integrate students into campus life.

It will be important for campuses to introduce veterans to both the academic and social milieu in college, engaging them socially and assisting them in meeting their academic goals.
Summary

• The global economic downturn is having an impact on the characteristics, attitudes, and beliefs of our students.
  – More concerned about finances
  – More likely to take out loans
  – Need grants in higher amounts
  – Likely be graduating with larger debts
  – Shifted major and career aspirations from business
Summary

• Values show a slight retrenching towards financial security and away from social agency
• Increased desire for volunteering, if manifested, can foster an increase in social agency and pluralistic orientation.
Summary

• Although more students are taking AP classes and exams, record numbers of students are coming to college having had, and feeling that they will need, remedial work.
  – Disparity between racial/ethnic groups still exists
Summary

• Although more students are taking AP classes and exams, record numbers of students are coming to college having had, and feeling that they will need, remedial work.
  – Disparity between racial/ethnic groups still exists
Summary

• Influx of veterans indicates that to maximize success in college
  – need for special services such as tutoring
  – encouragement from faculty and staff to become involved in the college community
